The Cow that Jumped over the Moon Doll 5pc./6"

Artist Mikhail Yudin captures the whimsical in this unique conversation piece. The brown cow that grazes by day is stirred in her sleep by the moon's gravity. Does she make it to the moon in actuality, or only in her dreams? How might this be an interpretation of your life? Enjoy hours of debate with your guests.

Working together the long winter through, a family can produce thousands of nesting dolls. In olden times, villagers filled large wicker baskets with wares, then schlepped them throughout the distant reaches of the czar's empire to sell at holiday bazaars. Nowadays, nesting doll makers like Golden Cockerel work with the villagers to produce exciting new designs and ship them to collectors around the world.

We offer special thanks to the Masyagin family of Polkhovski Maidan for teaching us the tricks of their trade, and honor them for their gift to the world.

What the men carve, the women paint in between farm chores. An optional priming layer of potato starch plugs the pores and provides a smooth base coat. Using a pencil, the artist sketches the outline, starting with the face (a compass draws a perfect circle). A heavy black outline is achieved by tracing the pencil with a thick felt-tip marker. She paints first with the lightest color and progresses to darker paints, covering up mistakes. For the finishing touch, she might apply real blush to her matryoshka's cheeks—straight out of her makeup kit! The last step is to fix the dried paint with a high gloss lacquer, applied by hand. Most ladies can keep pace with their husbands' production, easily painting 100 simple 5-piece dolls in a week.
